It might look like a surreal wedding, but the moment Miss Amanda Pericleous became engaged to her boyfriend, Larry, was anything but. A series of rather wacky mishaps, not to mention a bit of chick flicks, brought the lovebirds together.

In the case of Rosa ssp., genetic data indicate that the most common genotype found in the Iberian Peninsula is the R. spinosissima genotype, a native perennial with an almost holarctic distribution. This genetic situation is consistent with the presence of R. spinosissima-type specimens in the Ebro Valley and is also consistent with the analyses we made on R. frutescens and R. gallica populations from the Iberian Peninsula, where a single genotype was found in most cases. 4.3. The Phylogenetic Position of the Intra-Iberian Variants of R. spinosissima

{#sec4dot3-plants-08-00194} ----- Results from molecular data ([Figure 3]{#plants-08-00194-f003}{ref-type="fig"} and [Figure 4]{#plants-08-00194-f004}{ref-type="fig"}) and morphological analyses ([Figure 5]{#plants-08-00194-f005}{ref-type="fig"}) support our hypothesis of the identity of the R. spinosissima genotypes found in the Ebro Valley and those found in the Mediterranean Basin. Nevertheless, despite being represented by the same genotype, R. spinosissima specimens from the Ebro Valley (Ibaia-Llín and Calatayud) appear as more closely related to each other than to those found in the Mediterranean Basin (Balearic Islands, Spain, and France). We hypothesize that the local differentiation of these intra-Iberian variants could be related to their establishment. Both R. spinosissima genotypes may have arrived to the Iberian Peninsula several hundreds of years ago, and then expanded in the Iberian Peninsula, leaving different lineages. More recently, the two lineages could have undergone adaptation to the e79caf774b
