To no one, even to the mother, the nursemaid, the teacher, the friend or the doctor. It can be painful for them. I can hear the searing pain in the question, "Why are you killing yourself?" I heard it in the words of an English teacher, who asked why I was doing this. I told him I was doing it to myself because I was trying to live a normal life. He didn't believe me. After a long time, with its fair share of pain, I'd won the battle and begun to win the war. I was facing suicide as a creative act. My sister Sarah had reached out and said, "I love you." Others soon began to follow. First the journalists. They began to contact me. I was now famous among them. They saw me as someone worth reporting about. The psychologist Marie-Louise von Franz, on my death bed, called me an "artist of death". The American poet Seamus Heaney, on my death bed, called me an "artist of death".
