Jim Anthony Gullberg, General Gullbergs Big Book of Why.Q: Windows Phone Project Local Database Build Time I am working on windows phone project. The app is still in development and its not yet finished. One of my main concern is that the database size should be reasonable during build. I am using local SQLite Database for that purpose. As of my understanding, the amount of data I am inserting/updating at the initial state of the application is not huge. Hence the Build time for the project will still be reasonable. But when I run the application, the database size seems to be huge. Therefore I am taking the performance of the app. Some of the data that I am inserting is the geofences detected from the sensor. Is this proper? Please advise. A: I recommend using SQLite for your database. For Example - SQLite Database Browser You can make your database small enough by using only the data you need. You can restrict access to your data using SQL queries. For example if you use LINQ-to-SQL IT LINQ to SQL overcomes the limitation of the.NET Framework and supports both.NET Framework 2.0 and 3.5, so your applications can take advantage of the latest features of the.NET Framework 3.5. Check out LINQ To SQL Tutorial A case of cutaneous vasculitis and idiopathic thrombocytopenic purpura. Cutaneous vasculitis is associated with a variety of systemic disorders. We report the association of idiopathic thrombocytopenic purpura (ITP) with a case of reactive cutaneous vasculitis. Within four months of the development of
