Tropical Pacific Fruit Disease Tropical Pacific Fruit Disease (TPFD), also known as banana-ear malformation (BEM), is a disease caused by the Mycosphaerella fijiensis fungus, a fungal pathogen that can infect the fruit. TPFD is a challenging crop disease to control because of environmental conditions and the limited number of available control agents. History and symptoms Mycosphaerella fijiensis was first identified in the wild in Sri Lanka in 1968, and is reported to be native to Central and South America, Southeast Asia and tropical Oceania. TPFD was first discovered in Fiji in the 1970s and by 2001 was found to be present in nearly all banana-growing regions in the world where bananas are cultivated. Fruit infected by TPFD are most commonly yellow because of a buildup of starch in the fruit flesh, particularly in the lower portion. As the fruit ripens, it may show signs of bright red edges, a brown discoloration and cracks that can lead to rotting. The most serious consequence of infection is the spread of mycelia from the middle to the outer flesh of a fruit, resulting in the presence of large discolored areas on the surface of the fruit. These lesions can attract flies, which spread the infection. As more parts of the fruit become infected, the flesh can rot. This can ultimately result in premature fruit drop, meaning that the fruit will fall off the plant, especially at the lower portion of the fruit. Distribution and vectors TPFD is considered to be a tropical disease because it occurs in regions with average annual temperatures between 15-35 °C. The fungus can grow in temperatures ranging from 10-35 °C, however its survival and development is optimal in temperatures between 15-25 °C. TPFD is typically spread by the wind and is most common in areas with high levels of humidity, such as tropical rainforests, fields, and in close proximity to banana orchards. Management The most economical form of control against TPFD is the use of fungicides that can control fungal growth on the fruit and cause no harm to the plant. Unfortunately, there are limited fungicides available for use against TPFD,
