A variable-speed fluid pump of the type under discussion is known from DE 102 36 794 A1. The pump has a rotor housing which is provided with a rotor rotating about a rotor shaft, with a helical slot extending concentrically with the rotor shaft in the rotor housing, with a first and a second helical groove intersecting the helical slot, in which a ring gear meshes with the helical slot, and with a ring flange which is provided with teeth cooperating with the teeth of the ring gear and which radially projects with a gap from the end face of the rotor housing. Fluid flowing into and out of the pump is guided through a connecting channel running between the ring flange and the end face of the rotor housing. In the case of the variable-speed fluid pump disclosed in DE 102 36 794 A1, the fluid is guided over a relatively large distance through the connecting channel, until it impinges on the ring flange. The flow rate through the variable-speed fluid pump is therefore limited. In addition, a relatively large portion of the components of the variable-speed fluid pump is made of plastic, which means that the component parts must withstand relatively high operating stresses. Furthermore, the relatively large radial dimension of the connecting channel for the fluid makes it necessary to define the connecting channel on the end face of the rotor housing with a relatively complicated construction, which must have a relatively large design and which must be adapted in terms of the fluid flow to the particular operating conditions of the pump. In a known variable-speed fluid pump of the type under discussion (see DE 697 14 460 T2), which is known from the further publication DE 10 2009 030 550 A1, the fluid is guided between the rotor shaft and the inner wall of the housing of the variable-speed fluid pump in a corresponding arrangement with the structure of the connecting channel in the pump according to DE 102 36 794 A1, and to be precise in
